

Allowing — Quick Reference

Allowing is putting down the physical fight. It's the moment to moment relationship that you have to what is happening in your body right now? The sensations, the symptoms, the feelings. When something uncomfortable shows up, you'll notice that you automatically brace against it and your whole body grips and holds its breath and just waits for it to pass.

Allowing is noticing that grip and releasing it. It's not forcing relaxation, it's just stopping that brace. The sensation is still there. That's fine. We're not trying to make it go away. We're letting it be there. You're not fighting it anymore. Allowing is noticing it, softening around it, and continuing to engage in your life to take it with you.

It also applies to thoughts that spike in the moment. The what ifs or the catastrophizing. You just let all of that be there, allow it, let it be there. You don't engage or argue. You leave it alone. The sensation can be there. You can be soft around it. And you can keep living your life at the same time. So notice if you're not allowing what is there to be there, soften and keep going.

That's it.
