

I Don't Feel Like I'm Making Any Progress

There are gonna be a lot of points on this journey where you really believe that you're not making any progress. And a lot of the time that has to do with what we. Define progress as being and what we expect progress is supposed to look like. So if you don't feel like you're making progress, let me ask you some questions.

Do you notice that you're responding differently than you used to respond? Are you catching yourself faster? Are you reacting less even if you're still reacting sometimes? Has that decreased? Are you responding more? Are bad mornings turning into bad days less often for you? Are you staying in those mental spirals for a shorter period of time than you did before?

Are you organizing your entire life around how you feel or are you starting to get back into life? Anyway, if you answered yes to any of those things, I need you to know and hear me say right now that you are. Making progress. It just doesn't look like what you expected. And, and I understand that your relationship to symptoms is going to change before your symptoms change.

Because remember, the fear recovery comes first. Once we recover from the fear, the symptoms follow right behind. But if you're being honest with yourself, and the answer is no. You're still reacting the same way. You're still checking and researching and seeking reassurance and avoiding life until your symptoms and sensations get better.

Then the issue isn't that this doesn't actually work. The issue is you're not implementing it consistently. And I say that with so much compassion. This is hard. I was stuck in that loop for a really long time. It didn't feel safe to do this work. 'cause your brain is gonna fight you on it. It's gonna fight for whatever it thinks keeps you safe.

But this only works if you do it. So get really honest with yourself. Are you doing the work or are you consuming information about the work and hoping that's enough. That's never gonna be enough. If you need a reminder of what the work actually is, go back to the course lessons two, three, and four, and then go put it into practice.
