

I Keep Waking Up Anxious

If you keep waking up anxious or feeling feelings of doom or dread, I get that that was something that happened for years for me. This is one of the most common things when you're sensitized, your system doesn't even need a reason anymore to freak out, it just fires off. Having that morning activation is not a sign that today's gonna be a horrible day, and it's not a sign that you're getting worse.

It is just a sensitized system doing what sensitized systems do. So what matters the most is what you're gonna do next if you're laying there, scanning your body, checking in with every sensation, and trying to decide what does this mean for my day or my life? That's reacting. You are in this moment teaching your nervous system that this is an emergency that requires you to assess it.

So don't do it. Don't do the inventory, don't check. Don't decide anything about today based on how you feel right now. It's time to get up because laying there monitoring yourself makes it worse and you know that. You can still feel terrible and get out of bed or feel terrible and brush your teeth. The sensations can come with you.

Take them with you today. The morning doesn't have to set the tone for the whole day unless you let that first hour become a reaction spiral. If you feel like you need a refresher on responding versus reacting, I want you to revisit lesson four. Allowing is lesson nine and 10. But for now, let's get up, let it be there and start moving.

It's the whole thing.
