

I'm in the Middle of a Panic Spike

If you are in the middle of panic spiking for you, I wanna remind you that this is your nervous system firing off. That's all that it is. It is not dangerous. It's not a sign that something terrible is about to happen, even if that's what it feels like. It is just a surge of adrenaline and cortisol doing exactly what they are designed to do.

The problem though is if you keep reacting, it's going to keep this thing going. If you use that panic and that feeling like something is wrong and you start Googling, checking your body, calling somebody, sending dms, trying to escape, you're confirming to your nervous system that this was a real emergency.

It's getting the message that it was right to freak out because you are reinforcing it. And if you do that, it's going to keep doing this. So here's what you do. Nothing. You don't fix it. You don't fight it. You don't run from it. You let it happen. You can notice it briefly. This is what's happening for me right now and I know that this sounds insane when you are right in the middle of it.

'cause everything in your body is telling you that there's a really big problem. And so it's hard to not jump right into try to solve it. But please know that anytime panic spikes or symptoms spike. They have a lifespan, they rise, they peak, and then they come back down. But the caveat here is only if you stop adding fuel to it.

So what you can do right now is soften your body. You're probably all clenched up right now. Your jaw's all tight and your shoulders are up. Just let go a little. This isn't to make it stop or to stop the panic or come back down. It's just so we can stop bracing so hard against it. And then I want you to just pick up wherever you left off doing whatever you were doing, or if that's completely impossible for you, just sit there and let it be loud.

You don't have to do anything with it. You're just waiting it out without engaging a lot of the time. For many people, it's, it's better to reengage with something going on in your life than sit around with it. It gets tricky in these moments because your brain is going to tell you that this time is very different this time.

It's very real. This time you need to act, you need to do something, but that's what it always says. That's the fear talking. You've survived every single panic spike before this one, and I promise you're gonna survive this one too if you let it be there and let it pass. And don't make it mean anything. If you need a reminder of why we don't react to these moments.

You're gonna find that in lesson four. And if you want to understand what's happening in your nervous system, refer back to lesson one that this will pass. Just don't feed it.
